As the third book in a series of innovative publications that were designed, researched, and written by youth for youth, "Making Sense of One" will be a collection of personal stories, self expressions, history, art, and interviews on the experiences and thoughts of bi-racial Canadian youth. This project will work with 10 youth who straddle two words in their racial identity, and will document how they understand themselves as Canadians, their views on racism and exclusion, and how the world does or doesn't understand them. This book will explore the inspiring, and often isolating, experiences that bi-racial youth face; they are in the unique position of helping other youth and the larger society to understand what it truly means to bridge different worlds. This book will shed light on the stereotypes, the assumptions, challenges and privileges around the issues of racism and racial divide in our society, while celebrating the incredible diversity of Canadian youth identity.
