

EC18.13.15

To members of the Economic and Community Development Committee,

I am writing in support of City-wide legalization of backyard hens. I have kept backyard hens in Ward 9 for 8 years. We have had absolutely no problems, or complaints and keeping hens have brought us closer to our neighbours. During the pandemic they have been an important part of our household both as beds and providing eggs as a food source. I was beyond excited to see Ana Bailão request a vote on this, all residents of Toronto deserve the right to food.

The UrbanHensTO pilot program has demonstrated that backyard hens can easily be kept without causing odour, noise, pests or human health problems.

As the staff report says, “There have not been any significant issues with the UrbanHensTO pilot program.”

Having control over the food you eat is the basis of food sovereignty. Many people keep backyard hens to ensure they have healthy food to eat. They want to eat eggs that have been produced in a humane way.

Many people consider their hens to be beloved pets, in much the same way as others consider their dogs and cats to be family companions.

The staff report points out that many newcomers, seniors, vulnerable individuals, and Black, Indigenous and People of Colour (BIPOC) disproportionately reside in apartment towers, and that 40% of families living in apartment towers are low income. Much like community gardens, allowing community hen projects could make a protein source available to residents living on low incomes while still meeting city regulations. These should be explicitly allowed along with backyard hens.

Keeping backyard hens is a common urban practice throughout North America. (For example, 94 of the 100 largest cities in the U.S. allow backyard hens.) A bylaw legalizing backyard hens in Toronto should follow well-established guidelines and regulations that prioritize animal health and human safety. Such standards are commonly and straightforwardly enacted in cities across North America in enabling bylaws.

The UrbanHensTO pilot program has demonstrated that allowing backyard hens does not cause any significant issues. The pilot has demonstrated the safety, security and benefits of backyard hens.

I urge you to support the City-wide legalization of backyard hens.

Adam Dirks
