

Sean Moore

Sean Moore is a Partner and the Ottawa-based Public Policy Advisor at Gowling Lafleur Henderson LLP, one of Canada's leading diversified-service law firms.

Sean has more than 25 years experience in public-policy and advocacy related to local, provincial/state and federal government affairs. He has advised a wide variety of clients ranging from small businesses and community-based interest groups through to federal, provincial and foreign governments, trade and professional organizations as well as dozens of the world's largest corporations on their management of Canadian and U.S. public policy and societal issues. In addition to his more than two decades of experience in dealing with Canadian governments, he has also worked as a Washington, D.C. - based government-relations advisor on state and federal issues in the United States.

He holds a B.A. in political science from Carleton University as well as a D.P.A. from Carleton's Graduate School of Public Administration. He is a frequent lecturer, writer and commentator on public-policy advocacy, public consultations and civil society.

Sean writes a bi-weekly column on "Advocacy" in The Hill Times, a weekly newspaper on politics and government. He is currently a member of the Advisory Board of Carleton University's Faculty of Public Affairs and Management and recently joined the board of IMPACS - the Institute for Media, Policy and Civil Society.

He is currently co-authoring a book (with William T. Stanbury) on lobbying and public-policy advocacy "How the System Works and How to Work the System."
