COMMENTS

Arena Gardens was a historic building that once stood in the garden district of Toronto. This landmark was built in 1912 and at the time, was the largest indoor arena in the country. The Stanley Cup finals took place in the arena three times, with Toronto teams taking home the trophy each time: the Toronto Blueshirts in 1914, the Toronto Arenas in 1918 and the Toronto St. Pats in 1922. In 1938, the arena was renamed as the Mutual Street Arena and was later renamed as The Terrace in 1962. The building was later used as a curling club and roller skating rink before being demolished in 1989.

This unique arena was one of the first in Canada to offer an artificial ice rink and was the first place to host a radio broadcast of a hockey game in 1923. The arena was also used for many other sporting events, including professional wrestling matches. Aside from sports, it was used for other significant events such as the Liberal party reception for Sir Wilfred Laurier and the inaugural service of the United Church of Canada.

Some of this City's most memorable moments occurred in this building. A historical plaque was installed at the park to commemorate the significance of the Arena Gardens. Renaming the Cathedral Square Park to Arena Gardens would be an opportunity to recognize the importance the Arena Gardens has played in the history of Toronto.
