Summary

On June 1, 1866 more than a thousand Fenian insurgents invaded Canada across the Niagara River from Buffalo, New York. They were the spear-head in a planned assault for thousands of Fenians to cross the Canadian land and maritime borders with Michigan, Ohio, New York and Vermont. The Fenians, mostly battle-hardened Civil War veterans, were bent on driving the British out of Ireland by taking Canada hostage.

The battle at Limestone Ridge in the morning and the battle of Fort Erie in the afternoon of June 2, 1866 together referred to as the “Battle of Ridgeway” were the last battles fought in Ontario against a foreign invader. They were also Canada’s first modern battles and the first to be fought exclusively by Canadians and led in the field by Canadian officers.

A year after Ridgeway, a prominent veteran of the battle, Toronto schoolteacher Alexander Muir composed Canada’s unofficial national anthem “The Maple Leaf Forever”!

In 1931, the anniversary of the Battle of Ridgeway ceased to be marked as Canada’s memorial day when, in an Act of Parliament, R.B. Bennett’s Conservative government moved it to November 11th, the Great War Armistice Day to “harmonize” it with Commonwealth practice and officially renamed it Remembrance Day.
