Response from the Office of the Independent Police Review Director, received via online survey

1. In your view, are there gaps or deficiencies in the current oversight or complaints processes or bodies for policing in Toronto?

There is always room for improvement. At the OIPRD, I'm publishing guidelines and practice notes as means of increasing transparency, which I hope will improve the public's understanding of what we do and how we do it.

2. Currently, the Ontario Civilian Police Commission, the Office of the Independent Police Review Director and the Special Investigations Unit provide oversight on certain policing matters. What additional or different accountability mechanisms could improve the oversight of policing in Toronto?

There are now four oversight bodies, including the new Inspector General.

3. Is there anything else you would like to tell the City of Toronto about oversight and accountability in policing?

I'm available if you have any further questions.
